

Breaking up long quotes into bite-size chunks isn't hard to do

The Long Direct Quote

“For years, I assumed that I’d end up at UT-Austin or Rice or some place like that, but then I heard about Trinity College in Dublin, Ireland, and the more I looked into it, the more attractive it became. Trinity is like the Harvard of Ireland. So, my parents and I arranged to meet some of the university recruiters in Chicago, and that sealed the deal for us.

“It’s a lot different than I thought it would be. I live in a dorm that’s a half-hour commute from campus, and my flat mates have to stop and cook because there is no such thing as a dormitory meal plan. The year is broken into three terms, and I had to declare a major on my admissions application because students apply to a specific department instead of the college itself. I like it a lot, especially now that Ireland is part of the European Union. I’ve met people from all across Europe.”

— Jenny Brown

Example A

Jenny Brown said she assumed she would end up at UT-Austin, Rice or a university along those lines.

“But then I heard about Trinity College in Dublin, Ireland, and the more I looked into it, the more attractive it became,” Brown said. “Trinity is like the Harvard of Ireland. So, my parents and I arranged to meet some of the university recruiters in Chicago, and that sealed the deal for us.”

Brown said attending Trinity is more different than she thought it would be.

“I live in a dorm that’s a half-hour commute from campus, and my flat mates have to stop and cook because there is no such thing as a dormitory meal plan,” she said.

The year is broken into three terms, and she was required to declare a major because students apply to a specific department rather than the university itself.

“I like it a lot, especially now that Ireland is part of the European Union,” Brown said. “I’ve met people from all across Europe.”

Example B

“For years, I assumed that I’d end up at UT-Austin or Rice or some place like that,” Jenny Brown said.

Then, she heard about Trinity College in Dublin, Ireland. The more she looked into it, the more she liked it.

“Trinity is like the Harvard of Ireland,” she said. “So, my parents and I arranged to meet some of the university recruiters in Chicago, and that sealed the deal for us.”

Brown lives in a dorm about a half-mile from campus. There’s no dormitory meal plan, so she and her roommates cook.

“The year is broken into three terms,” she said, “and I had to declare a major on my admissions application because students apply to a specific department instead of the college itself.”

All in all, she’s having a grand time.

“I like it a lot, especially now that Ireland is part of the European Union. I’ve met people from all across Europe.”
